How USA won first Curtis Cup Match

By Joyce Wethered, Playing captain of the Great Britain & Ireland team in the first Curtis Cup match (1932)

In 1932 came the news that America was sending over a team to play us at Wentworth in the spring. At last we were to face our most redoubtable opponents in an official match.

Although the general public appeared to be confident of our success, those of us who knew something of the form of the American ladies were not so sure.

The results of the morning foursomes (3-0 for the Americans) were certainly disappointing. In two respects we proved inferior to the American ladies that day – in temperament and characteristically in the putting.

Two of the foursomes matches, coming all square to the last hole, were lost to the undistinguished figure of 6. Wanda Morgan and I were the first to set this regrettable example against Glenna Collett Vare and Mrs Hill. We were two up most of the way out until I missed a short putt at the eighth.

Unfortunately, we frittered away our chances and, standing all square, we came to the last and most disastrous hole of all. Two good drives were followed by a poor second from Mrs Hill and a topped brassie shot from Wanda. Then I hit my approach into a right-hand bunker; Wanda just got out; my run-up lay a good two yards from the hole, and the putt for a half in 6 was missed.

Very Fine Play

The match behind, in which Enid Wilson and Mrs Watson played against Virginia van Wie and Helen Hicks, produced some very fine golf and the Americans eventually won by 2 and 1 after standing level 45 for the 17 holes played.

The last foursome between Molly Gourlay and Doris Park and Maureen Orcutt and Mrs Cheney, nearly turned out to be a splendid recovery for our side after we had stood two down with four to go. But, coming all square to the 18th, the hole again seemed to exercise a fatal obsession. Without going into further details, Great Britain lost another foursome by the margin of one stroke.

This was, therefore, far from being a pleasant position at lunch-time, but, as a matter of fact all of the British team except one made a good start in the afternoon singles.

By the fifth hole I was standing three up on Glenna; Enid Wilson was holding Helen Hicks after a brilliant beginning on both sides; Wanda Morgan was two up on Virginia van Wie; Diana Fishwick was as much as four up on Maureen Orcutt, and Molly Gourlay was known to be leading against Mrs Hill. So it seemed that there was still a chance.

With Glenna not playing as well as in the morning, my own match came to an end on the 14th green. I turned back to learn the fate of the others. With the exception of Diana Fishwick and Enid Wilson, we were slowly but steadily losing ground against the Americans' relentless pressure. But first of all we had the satisfaction of seeing Diana maintain her triumphant form to the end. Giving Maureen Orcutt no chance of recovering from an indifferent start, she won by 4 and 3.

Then we followed the match between Enid Wilson and Helen Hicks. The golf was excellent on both sides, each player taking infinite pains to leave nothing to chance. Even when the torrent of rain increased and made the conditions still more wretched, the same dour thoroughness continued right up to the 17th hole, where the match ended. Here Enid struck a splendid three-yard putt firmly and decisively into the hole to win by 2 and 1.

We now stood three up in the singles, but our rising hopes were short-lived. Any thought of a successful recovery vanished when we heard that Elsie Corlett was several holes down and that Wanda's early lead was slowly fading away.

I was only able to see the last hole of this match. Virginia van Wie had, by this time, gained the lead and stood one up with two to play. A glorious iron shot and a perfectly struck putt ended the match – a perfect 2.

The rain was now falling in a deluge and the two matches still left to be decided were not fated to relieve the general gloom of an irretrievable position.

So the match ended 5-3 in favour of Americans and the fight was over; a fight that had produced many patches of fine play, with the issue hung in the balance for least the first half of the afternoon. If it was not our good fortune to win at Wentworth, there is still the future to look forward to.
